ART AT VIENNA.

The Display of Fine Arts at the Exhibition.

Austrian and German Schools-Munich, Berlin, Dusseldorf-The Coronation of the German Emperor.

VIENNA, May 31, 1873.

The picture gallery of the Vienna Exhibition consists of one centre department about seventy feet square, sixteen rooms lighted from above measuring about sixty leet by thirty-seven feet, sixteen narrow side lighted rooms, each sixty feet by nineteen, and four corner rooms about thirty-two feet square, top lighted.

There are two smaller buildings, resembling on plan the letter T. also devoted to various fine art purposes, and in one of these the United States ave space allotted for their pictures; at present only some half dozen have arrived, but more are on their way. Considering the great distance and the risk involved, it will not cause much surprise if the exhibition should prove only a small one. GENERAL ASPECT.

Of the long building described above Austria Hungary and Germany employ one-half, France takes half the remainder and the other quarter is almost equally divided between Belgium, Holland

Like America, Italy, Spain, Russia, Norway, Sweden, Denmark and Greece find space for their works of fine art proper in the two smaller buildings. In the centre gallery of the long edifice all nations are supposed to have space, but the large pistares of Germany, Belgium and France monopolize the greater part of its walls, the other countries not being anxious to contribute pictures to this kind of competitive gallery to the detriment of their separate collection. AUSTRIA.

In the Austrian rooms brightness of color and sparkling light constitute the first impression on entering. A more careful survey reveals the fact that gaudy tints are too lavishly employed; that the sparkle is apt to degenerate into mannerism. One of the most remarkable pictures is by Mateiko. an artist of manifest power. It represents the Russians doing homage to Stephen Barthony, the Hungarian, and is full of the most surprising imitations of precious robes and draperies, characteristic heads and well observed and delineated action. It abounds in thoroughly well painted accessories, nor is the color deficient. Its principal defect consists in a want of repose. The many figures, which, by the way, are at least the size of life, appear equally lighted and almost equally prominent, and the eye is puzzled whereon to dwell. The painters of other large pictures err less in this respect, but are tamer. As a contrast, the work by I. Lux may be selected—where the light is almost over-concen-trated on the girl's head, and would bear an echo in another part of the canvas. The fault, however, is a good one, for the attention is directed to the proper quarter, a pretty girl's face. The coloring is agreeable-if somewhat low toned in the shadows. Angelis' portraits are refined in drawing and harmoniously colored; good examples of his powers are the full length of a lady in e black dress, and the head of a middle-aged lady beneath it. Matejko's portraits are extremely in-dividual. He seems to caricature the hands, both in action and drawing, and in one portrait of a lady where an extremely well painted background unfortunately kills the flesh the hands are posilady where an extremely well painted background unfortunately kills the flesh the hands are positively ugly.

O. Van Thoren sends a capital piece of a Bohemian shepherd, prepared to defend his trightened flock, from wolves, probably; he scans the distance, rifle in hand, in the direction pointed out by a companion, while the dog, ears pricked, tail pendant, forms an advanced guard. The landscape background is very good, and the whole picture sober and well balanced. A small picture, a few inches square, by Pettenkofer, is extremely likely to be overlooked. It is, however, the most complete thing in the Austrian galleries. More minute, if possible, than Meisonnier, it has all the truth and wonderful execution, but with a dash and go rarely, if ever, found in the great French painter. It shows us a rough country wagon, such as you may see in Austria or Bohemia, filled with soldiers, driven full gallop by a peasant; horses tearing away, three abreast; dust rising in clouds, wheels spinning, and in the centre of the group a drummer sending out a stirring roll from the parchment; the heads of more horses and more men just visible amid the dense volumes of dust in equal whirl and hurry. Another good picture of a young runaway couple, overtaken at a roadside inn by a dignified elderly lady and her servant, is by E. Kurzbauer who, though an Austrian, really belongs to the French school. The story is capitally told and the arrangement and grouping admirable. Unfortunately a peasant woman, who is in reality only an accessory figure, occupies the most prominent position and engrosses the principal mass of light. There are several landscapes of merit, especially woman, who is in reality only an accessory figure, occupies the most prominent position and engrosses the principal mass of light. There are several landscapes of merit, especially two by E. Lichteniels and August Schaeffer. The large number of German landscape painters repeat their lavorable effect of a foreground in coshadow and the background in warm, ruddy light. It has become a convention with them and has almost degenerated into a trick. The great colorists of the Italian and Dutch schools well knew that color is to be sought in the hall tones and shadows; they therefore rarely attempted vivid lights. The splendid but subdued glow spread itself over the entire picture. The Germans, on the contrary, in their landscapes fill the light only with rich color, and their shadows are left poor and uninteresting in consequence.

splendid but subdued glow spread itself over the entire picture. The Germans, on the contrary, in their landscapes fill the light only with rich color, and their standows are left poor and uninteresting in consequence.

The battle pieces of Emeié and L'Allemand are very good and have the merit of appearing true, though the latter is not quite successful in giving the sense of the stir and excitement one supposes would accompany such a scene. Canon is an imitator of the tones of the old masters, but where they produced richness he is apt to get leathery and heavy.

The Munica, Berlin and Dusseldorf pictures, like the Frenca, are not yet opened to the public, although the first named are pretty nearly all on the wails. Of the Munich contributors, Dreylegger is one of the most popular disciples. His picture of a Tyrolese peasant's home, where an old man, aspiring to agility in the dance which no doubt distinguished him in his youth, leads off a young girl, to the amusement of the assembled company. The expression in the various faces and the attitudes of the figures are as natural and appropriate as can be imagined. The composition is ingenious, and the management of light and shade admirable. The general coloring of the picture is not remarkable. Indeed, there is a tendency to a chocolate hue. Two other works by the same artist deserve careful attention. Herrmann Kaulbach's picture of the death of Mozart is extremely interesting. The dying genius sits, propped up by pillows, near a window, the light from which streams through a green blind upon the principal group. In the back part of the room some friends around a harpsichord periorm the grand requiem, the masterpiece of the expiring man, whose hand is being bathed in tears by his wife; close by is the cradie with the baby in charge of another child. The story is well told. Mathias Schmidt has three pictures, in which the conduct of monks and priests towards the ignorant peasants of the Tyrol is illustrated, and their licentions of rustic and humble life. In the brawl in a mediacyal tavern is a more considered work.

Dietz may be called the Munich Meisonnier for mastery of delicate workmanship.

In the Berlin and Dusseldorf schools the most prominent works are by Knauss, who exhibits some genre pictures painted with his usual knowledge and accomplishment, in which, however, charm of color is absent.

Bendermann, with a large, allegorical picture of Jeremias—iuli of academically drawn pictures and draperies and that acquaintance with studio accessories and properties so necessary to the German high masters of art.

Honneberg, also a painter of allegory, but seeking his material in the repertorial of Albert Durer, Gustav Richter, with a large picture of Egyptians building a pyramid, finely drawn and considered, and two most original portraits of himself and his wife, each holding a child, are pictures well worthy of attention. Brendell is a good cattle painter. Gabl, who contributes a very interesting work of peasants drawing for the conscription; Scheyer, the well known depicter of scenes in which horses form the main interest; Ad. Meusel, represented by a very large picture or the coronation of the present Emperor of Germany, where the mass of red the painter had to deal with has evidently caused him difficulties, and a small canvas of a woodland scene, charming in treatment and truthful rendering: Ziegler and Gebier are animal painters; Hildebrandt, F. Kaulbach and Von Heyden, all three sending portraits, and many more of lesser note, whose works crowd the rooms devoted to Germany.

The French, Belgian and English schools must be left to a future notice.

AFRICA.

The War Between the Ashantees and Fantees-British Alarm at the Progress

Fantees—British Alarm at the Progress of the Ashantees.
Private advices received in Liverpool by the latest mail from West Africa states that the march of the Ashantees towards Cape Coast Castle and Elmina was unchecked, as the Fantees were totally disorganized and incapable of offering any effective resistance. The number of Ashantees, according to the last account, who were advancing on Cape Coast Castle and Elmina was estimated at about fitty thousand, while large reinforcements were awaiting them on their near approach to Elmina. The majority of the Asnantee troops are well armed and have plenty of war material, many of them being armed with Enfield rifles and breechloaders.

of them being armed with Enfield rifles and breechloaders.

It was by this force that Lieutenant Hoskins and his Houssa troops and volunteers were compelled to retire, but it is expected that the detachments from the Second West India regiment, who have been sent from Bermuda, will enable the English forces at Cape Coast Castle to meet the Ashantees on equal terms. The government are making efforts to protect the British interests on the West Coast, and supplies of war material and provisions, both for the troops and the war vessels on the coast, are leaving Liverpool by every steamer.
The British and African Company's mail steamer Loanda, Captain Folland, which sailed from the Mersey lately for the West Coast of Africa, had on board a large amount of government supplies, including provisions, &c., for Sierra Leone and Cape Coast Castle.

ACHEEN.

Condition of the Hollanders' Army After Its Defeat by the Sultan's Soldiers.

Its Defeat by the Sultan's Soldiers.

[From the Singapore (E. I.) Times, May 3.]

We learn from the Pinang Gazette of the 26th ult. that the Datch were driven back from the Sultan's palace or fort at Acheen to the beach, and that their bine jackets had embarked on board ship.

On the 17th ult., the latest date from Acheen, the Dutch troops were within their stockades on the beach, under the protection of the guns of the manoi-war, discouraged and in a manner demoralized. The Achinese, on the contrary, were elated and brimiul of fighting to the bitter end. The Achinese are reported to have European leaders, not unknown in Singapore.

We are informed by the Dutch Consul General that he has advices from Acheen to the 25th ult., to the following effect:—"The Dutch troops began to re-embark on the 25th inst., and the expedition would be ready for sea in a-few days. The Achinese had not molested them in any way since they had returned to the beach."
